

Excerpt from A Sermon: Preached at Bridge Street, Bristol, October 19, 1803, Being the Day Appointed for a General Fast Some apology is due to the public for this discourse appearing so long after it was preached. The fact is, the writer was engaged in an exchange of services for a month with his highly esteemed friend, the Rev. Mr. Lowell, of Bristol, author of an excellent volume of Sermons on Practical Subjects, at the time it was delivered, and had no opportunity of writing it till he returned. As it touches entirely on permanent topics, except what relates to the threatened invasion, still impending over us, he knows not but it may be as suitable now as if it had appeared earlier. As it is, he commits it to the candour of the public. He has only to add, that the allusion to the effects of the tragic muse, should have been marked as a quotation, though the author knows not with certainty to whom to ascribe it. He believes it fell from the elegant pen of an illustrious female, Mrs. More. About the Publisher Forgotten Books publishes hundreds of thousands of rare and classic books.
