

Georgia O'Keeffe (Sun Prairie, Wisconsin, 1887 – Santa Fe, 1986) In 1905, Georgia O'Keeffe followed her studies at the Art Institute of Chicago and began her artistic career seriously. She then moved to New York and enrolled at the Art Students League School. Georgia loved the life drawing classes taught by the dynamic William Merritt Chase, one of the teachers who influenced her during this period. She frequented the gallery 291 and met her future husband, the photographer, Alfred Stieglitz. In 1912, she followed her studies at the University of Virginia under Alon Bement who used a revolutionary method to teach art, inspired by Arthur Wesley Dow. Students did not mechanically copy nature, but were taught to understand the principles of drawing based on geometric forms. They practiced dividing a square, drawing a circle in the center or placing a rectangle around a drawing, then organizing the composition by adding or eliminating elements. Georgia found that this method gave art a structure and helped her understand the basics of abstraction. At the beginning of 1925, Stieglitz encouraged the artists of the 291. It was during this exhibition that Georgia O'Keeffe's large flower paintings, intended to make people aware of nature, were first presented. The critics applauded this new way of seeing. She hated the sexual connotations that people associated with her paintings, especially at that time in the 1920s when Freudian theories were beginning to resemble what we would call today "psychology of the bazaar". Her heritage that Georgia leaves behind is a unique vision that translates the complexity of nature into simple forms. She teaches us that there is poetry in nature and beauty in geometry.
